VIII. SUBTERBANEAN METAMORPHOSIS. When Ringbrand opened his eyes he found himself lying on his back in what appeared to be the bottom of a well; at least, that was his second lmpression. With the first gleams of returning consciousness there was no recollection of the events immediately preceding his fall, and for a moment he had a vague idea that he had stumbled and hurt himself in the road, and that the clouds had covered all but the small patch of sky directly overhead where the stars were still visible. called the details of the capture up to the sudden blank following the plunge into the hole between the bowlders. A sharp twinge of paln bridged the interval and remiaded him that there were two present and pressing sources of discomfort in the gnarled log across which he was lying and in the vice-like ressure of the rope which still bound is arms to his aldes. To wriggle out of the uncomfortable position was easy, sening the rope was another matter. The knot had been drawn tight by the jerk of his fall, and it was ionr or more before he succeeded in orking it around where it eren whea this ; it of dam well an

It occurred to him at once that it might be a continuation of the same cavern, or that possibly he might be in the very er into which he had tried to penetrate; but this seemed unlikely, for two reasons. One was that he could not make the locality of the McNabb tunnel agree with the general direction of his wanderings of the night previous; and the other was even more convineing, for, while his cell termlasted at one extremity in a narrow fissure like the one in which he had lost the pick and the lamp, he could not find the missing articles, though he lost no time in making a careful search for them. In doing this, however, he stumbled upon another discovery which was of much more immediate importance: reaching down into the erannies of the fissure, his hand found a pool of water, and he drank gratefully, dipping up the cool liquid by apoonfula in his hollowed

perfure overhee

After this, he gave an hour to minute mination of the boundaries of his prison, scrutinizing the walls and carefully weighing every possible chance of eccape. At the end of this preliminary survey he sat down upon the log, which proved to be the trunk of a small tree huried by some accident of wind or lightning through the opening above, past few days, in the hope of finding something to account for the mysteri-ous attack and imprisonment. In this effort he racked his brain to little purpose, and, after repeatedly sconting the idea as absurd, he finally accepted the conclusion that the Bynnms had in ome manner connected him with the ortunes of their enemies, and had taken prompt measures to deprive the ers of a possible ally.

Latimers of a possible any.

"If that's the case," he mused, speakng aloud for the sake of the companionchip of his own voice, "what do they mean to do with me? If they had wanted to kill me, they certainly had it all their own way last night; a very an't it; they don't mean murder; they're only trying to get me out of the way for awhile. And the next thing is, for how long? Keeping in view the comorting conclusion that they don't ntend making away with me, the question will answer itself in a few hours at the most, for they haven't given me anything to eat. Which reminds me that I'm pretty hungry, now;" he looked ruefully at his watch. "Tom Ludlow had his breakfast two hours ago, and at the present moment, I anppose, he's sitting in his office with the comfortder-thought that it'll be dinnerto know what it is to sit in a crack in the face of the earth, speculating on the doubtful possibilities of future meal mes. When the failure of the knife int an eml to the expedient, he examhed the narrower part of the crevice to see if he could not climb to the roof by bracing himself from wall to wall. As it was reasonably evident that the envern had originally been nothing more than an irregular crack in the snnilstone, open at the top through its entire length, and afterward gradually covered in hy slow accumulations of carth and debris interwoven with twice and grass roots, he argued that it would be comparatively easy to dig through this thin covering if he could obtain a foothold near enough to the roof to enable him to attack it. # The Blue and the Gray.

Both men and women are apt to feel a little blue, when the gray hairs begin to show. It's a very natural feeling. In the normal condition of things gray hairs belong to advanced age. They have no business whitening the head of man or woman, who has not begun to go down the slope of life. As a matter of fact, the hair turns gray regardless of age, or of life's seasons; sometimes it is whitened by sickness, but more often from lack of care. When the hair fades or turns gray there's no need to resort to hair dyes. The normal color of the hair is restored and retained by the use of
